Open source tools make software approaches to problems that are not limited to design and build user interfaces and development workflows. It's freedom and privacy versus a small group of hyper-competent designers living in a closed community with overpriced proprietary software. The open source program is much more capable, but the cost to reach that capability is far higher. The open source software is also often more expensive. It's the information that tells a digital imaging program what you want a photo to do.
