I confess — I've been staying away from Photoshop lately. I use Lightroom quite extensively, mostly because it's the only RAW file management solution available for Mac. And Photoshop's just way too heavy for that. Don't get me wrong — it's a fantastic editing tool, but I just don't use it for RAW conversion anymore.

There are better ways to edit RAW files out there. Those include a new Photoshop plugin called Oxygen Color, which lets you manually apply color corrections very quickly. Or try Lightroom's "Smart Fix" feature, which corrects both gray and color images. And then there's Adobe's just-announced Adobe Lens Correction tool. I tried Lens Correction and I was impressed with its results. Only three options — Lens Correction, Restore to Neutral, and Auto Lens Correction — are available when launching Photoshop, but that's fine, because you never really need more than two options. The first button restores the colors to neutral, and the second button does that, plus some additional white balance corrections. Lens Correction is right there on the right-click menu, so it's convenient and easy to use. I expect Lens Correction will be a big help to photographers with substandard lenses. This is especially true if you shoot in digital mode and then capture photos on film (I own both, so I know first-hand how awful typical digital cameras are). And if you take a look at the comparison in the top left of this review, you'll see why Lens Correction can work wonders with the results.
