I have a development branch of my company's software that we're using for debugging and other purposes, and it's on my desktop's file system. I'm wondering, when I update my repository, does the repo's information on my laptop need to be online? Or can the client automatically grab it the next time it's needed? A: The client reads from the server, so it's not going to run if it's not connected. You can set it up to automatically check for updates (if you're on linux, it's called 'trickle')
