My biggest gripe with Lightroom is the fact that there are still not more bug fixes coming out in rapid-fire succession. When I speak of bugs, I am referring to the aforementioned performance issues. These include the following: slow import speeds, unreliable file browser, inability to filter the added star rating, as well as occasional crashes with multi-selecting to edit images. These do not necessarily render the program unworkable, but it soon becomes frustrating to work with when you feel that there are things that could be improved and that developers can add more items to their list. If the software releases a version that simply does not run, that's a different story. In essence, I am not here to tell you that Lightroom is ready for your hard drive, but rather that we are missing some of the features that we would expect from such a well-known and powerful program. While I have no complaints regarding the advanced editing tools and organization functionality of Lightroom, the Developer Preview did change the scope of the main Big Picture interface. Now that Photoshop Elements is gone, Lightroom is the only program that we would need. Or would we? I have been using the Power Glove app for quite some time, and I would have no problem moving my work across to Lightroom. I mean, the current crop of mobile devices is less than stellar when it comes to photo editing, and we all know that the Cloud is the future. But it's hard not to think that there's room for improvement. I'll keep things in perspective for now, but if Lightroom gets faster and more stable, too, my thinking might change. That said, Lightroom now sits in the perfect position to fully compete with Photoshop when it comes to image management, editing, and photographic workflow.
